

Investing in the Future of CM

We've grown accustomed to reporting ever-larger membership numbers over the years, up to our current record level of more than 6,000. But there is an interesting story within this data, one that encourages me to be even more optimistic about our future.

We want to be the “go-to” organization on infrastructure issues. Our members know how to get complex and vital projects done. CMAA represents a major resource of both knowledge and professionalism. This orientation makes CMAA very unusual, possibly even unique in the world: The only professional organization with a consistent focus on excellence in execution of critical infrastructure programs.

CMAA remains an organization for professional Construction and Program Managers. Our key constituencies are owners and the organizations and individuals that serve them. But the most important thing we offer to the entire industry is a comprehensive, consistent strategy for improving construction outcomes based on application of our Standards of Practice.

Increasingly, we are able to introduce these young professionals to our SOPs, Code of Ethics, and Body of Knowledge at the beginning of their careers. Then, we support them throughout their careers with programs and services specific to their experience levels and interests.

That's truly a sound strategy for investing in our future.
